Abstract:

Globalization is not only a phenomenon merging economies and creating an economic hegemony but also a cultural and an institutional reality. “The history of globalization, actually, is a history of technological change and a political preference.” (Tekin-Koru, 2020: 87). Recessing world economies that are often affected by long due crises are now facing economic and institutional consequences of a crisis that suddenly emerged from pandemic conditions. Therefore, the globalization notion, which is already highly debatable, has become more debatable with the COVID-19 pandemic. The consequences of globalization and pandemic conditions have affected women's labor force deeply. The women labor force that is already facing many struggles and problems in almost every sector has become to be more observable evidently. In this study, the types of struggles that the women labor force has faced after the COVID-19 pandemic shall be analyzed through a feminist economics perspective. Firstly, the globalization notion will be scrutinized by drawing a general perspective and the reasons why it became more debatable with the emergence of the pandemic. After that, the change in women's labor force will be evaluated by the case of feminist economics that is affected by institutional consequences of the pandemic. Source: Tekin-Koru, A. (2020).
